"Well, I was at East St. Louis one summer when the electric battery was all the vogue. A racing rule at that time provided that although the battery could be used, the trainer must announce it before the race. There was a horse named Walter in the stables there; a pretty good animal

He Carried a Battery.

"The first day that Walter started it was announced that he would carry a battery. Several of the wise boys who get up early in the morning to see the ponies kept their eyes on Walter, and in their minds Walter's name was changed to

A. Goode Thyng.
"Of course, the horse was selling nicely at first, but bets were about even later on, for in those days every one had more or less faith in the persuasive powers of the battery. But it was a bad bill that day. The distance was only six fur-longs. Walter was outside the money, hat day. The distance was outside the money, out coming strong enough to make the arly morning pikers think that he would lo at a longer distance.

"Later in the week Walter was on for mile and a sixteenth. Walter will carry he battery' was announced, but, in spite of the needle-injecting apparatus underseath the saddle, Walter was away back in the ruck and was put down even by he sunrise specialists as no good. He continued to start regularly, however, but lailed to come within the money even once. Each time he started the announcement was made that Walter would carry the battery. The frequenters of the pacific on became weary and consigned Walter to a hotter place than even East St. Louis was at that time. The odds against Walter took a jump each time Walter failed to come home in time to meet the other horses as they scored. At last they were away up in the air.

"There were lengths and lengths of nice dusty track between Walter's hoofs and the next horse, which was a good one, too. I doubt if the boy who was up on Walter could hear the others coming. Walter had carried the battery that day, too. But what is more, the battery had been turned on. In all those other races the boy had instructions never to turn on the current. A few of those who were 'next' garnered enough of Uncle Sam's best textile goods of a green shade to carry them over several meetings. It was not long afterward that the battery drop-
